¶ There runs through the works of Augustus Saint-Gaudens a dominant note—the underlying, pervading quality of truth. In many of his important works there is revealed another element, the theme or thought expressed. In the Sherman monument, there is expressed the glory of the triumphant conqueror; in the Shaw Memorial, the courage and devotion of the patriot; and in the Lincoln, the patience, and solicitude or love of the great President. This latter quality, the thought expressed, is not less important than the quality of truth—if expressed at all it is of the highest importance. The sculptor, however, having chosen form as a means of expression, must, perforce, express his thought with fidelity to the essential truth of nature. Saint-Gaudens meets this requirement abundantly: whether the work be a simple portrait study, an allegorical figure, or an imaginative composition, like the Sherman Victory, absolute truth in every detail seems to have been a controlling motive in its execution.

¶ In considering these two phases of Saint-Gaudens' art, and, indeed, in estimating the work of any sculptor, it should be borne in mind that the power to express a thought, or to record an incident is not the peculiar property of the sculptor or painter. It is common to all the arts. Writers in all ages have clothed the sentiments of patriotism, devotion and love with glowing, written words.

¶ There is this distinction to be observed, however; words may only be used to express thought, while form may express the subtle qualities of truth and beauty, quite independent of story or theme. It is the first purpose of plastic and pictorial art to call forth the pleasurable sensations and emotions, resulting from the simple enjoyment of beauty for its own sake.

¶ Certain it is that in the pursuit of simple truth, or perfection, Saint-Gaudens knew no resting place, but followed on, heedless alike of fatigue or discouragement, until he attained the completion and perfection of the least and last detail.

¶ He seemed ever ready to go back and correct, add to or eliminate, that which to him was unsatisfactory or untrue. If a special sitting to study the hand of Stevenson was required, or the removal of the great Sherman monument from Buffalo to Windsor seemed desirable, for the purpose of making slight changes in mane or drapery, he was ready for the trouble and the task. Even after the splendid Sherman was in place at the entrance to Central Park, the writer recalls the sculptor's willingness to make a replica, smaller in size; the more especially, as he said, because to do so would enable him to make some slight changes in details of the work. It was this never ending struggle for perfection which dominated his life, and enabled him to secure a high and abiding degree of perfection in all his work. He knew intimately and he executed faithfully. In the presence of these masterpieces we are, I fear, prone to forget the years of unremitting labor they represent.

¶ To understand fully the perfect flower, as represented in the final and supreme consummation of Saint-Gaudens' art, one must have watched its growth; one must have sat beside the young student in Paris, during days of privation and labor, while he learned to search out the essential qualities of things, and while he labored to mold and fashion the forms he approved. More than this, one would have had to follow down the path of time, during the succeeding forty years, and to have observed the intense application, the constant, thoughtful observation, and the everlasting effort of the never resting student as he studied, and studied, and studied nature in her ever-varying moods and multitudinous forms. It was because he did all this that he was able, having comprehended Lincoln's innermost character, to represent the great President in form so true that it is startling in its simple and almost perfect reality.

¶ Saint-Gaudens did not create the character of Lincoln; it existed before he undertook the work, but he must have devoted an infinite amount of study to the life of the great President to have so fully comprehended and to have so successfully represented him.

¶ In the presence of this superb work, one feels that the man who wrote the Gettysburg address must have possessed all the dignity, pathos and impressive distinction expressed by it.

¶ It was simply given Saint-Gaudens to comprehend the character of the patient, gentle leader; and because he understood and had the supreme ability to express his conception in form, his work is imperishable.

¶ Beside this work, all that remains to visibly represent Lincoln are a few portraits and photographs, and not all of these represent the spirit of the man in full measure. Probably the tender and lovely print representing him reading to little "Tad" more fully expresses the character of Lincoln, as Saint-Gaudens seems to have felt it, than any other. At least, it represents Lincoln as we have, through a hundred avenues of information, learned to know and to love him.

¶ What is true of Saint-Gaudens' Lincoln is equally true of his Sherman. He understood the grim and resolute character of the great general with certainty, and his portrait of the victorious warrior is one of the marvelous character studies of modern sculpture. It is at the same time one of the most inspiring, intellectual representations of an exalted theme, The Victor Triumphant, ever recorded by art or literature. And as this work represents the home coming of the battle-worn general, led by the spirit of victory, in like manner and with equal force does the Shaw memorial represent the patriotic spirit and devotion of the soldier, departing for the scene of battle, led by the spirit of duty. The martial tread of the colored soldiers, the proud, confident bearing of the youthful white officer, the suggestion of conflict conveyed by the accoutrements and arms, are all expressed with power and fidelity. The Shaw memorial is truly inspiring, and eloquently expresses the sense of duty which led the young officer and his men forth to do battle in the cause of humanity.

¶ In each of these works there is combined with the literary theme presented, the uncompromising, sympathetic, simple truth of nature. It matters not which of these qualities you place first in importance, whether the quality of truth or the thought expressed, it is absolutely essential that both be perfectly expressed in works of a subject character.

¶ Saint-Gaudens understood this perfectly. He combined, with a perfect mastery, the theme with the purely sculptural qualities of form, in such manner as to appeal at once to the æsthetic sense and to the most potent sentiments of the human mind. He possessed the power to portray an exalted thought in truthful terms, as have few men in the history of art. Truly, as Saint-Gaudens said, "You can do anything you please. It's the way it's done that makes the difference."

AUGUSTUS SAINT-GAUDENS.

¶ "You can do anything you please. It's the way it's done that makes the difference."—Augustus Saint-Gaudens.

¶ Augustus Saint-Gaudens, by birth half French and half Irish, by nature and training American, came to this country at his mother's breast in 1848 when six months old. His father, Bernard Paul Ernest Saint-Gaudens, was born in the little village of Aspet in the south of France. There he learned his trade of shoemaker, and thence he slowly travelled by way of Paris and London to Dublin, Ireland, where he met his future wife, Mary McGuiness, who bound slippers in the shoe store for which he made boots. On arriving in New York this hot-headed, eccentric Frenchman, to the detriment of his trade, developed infinitely more interest in organizing Fraternal Societies than in selling shoes. Consequently, from the first, Augustus Saint-Gaudens, the third of five sons, took part in the family struggle for a livelihood.

¶ Until the age of thirteen the youngster received the ordinary education of the New York boy of 1850. Those were the days of lickings at the hands of his teacher, and of fights with the West Broadway "gang"; and the struggle with these elements shaped the energy which lasted him through life. Yet despite his prosaic surroundings his artistic inclinations took shape early. They originated with the representation of soldiers upon a school slate. They emerged through charcoal-scrawled drawings upon the neighboring walls. And finally they were recognized by Dr. Rea Agnew, a customer of Bernard Saint-Gaudens, who found such merit in the young man's sketches that he urged the father to continue his son's education in this direction.

¶ In consequence the boy was apprenticed to a hard-tempered man named Avet, one of the first stone cameo cutters in America, who led Augustus a miserable life for the next few years. At the same time the boy entered the drawing school of the Cooper Institute. There he studied evenings until in 1864 he revolted at the ill nature of his employer, and upon being discharged, obtained a position with a more kindly master, Jules LeBrethon, and at about the same time left the Cooper Union to work from the life in the National Academy of Design.

¶ This period of Saint-Gaudens' youth passed in the excitement of the days of the Civil War. From his window he looked down upon the New England Volunteers marching along Broadway, in the city squares he witnessed the recruiting; and these sights, combined with a glimpse of Lincoln driving through the city, stirred his blood with that strong but restrained patriotism which finally he fused into his monuments of Farragut, Lincoln, Shaw, Logan and Sherman.

¶ But the New York life came to an end in 1867 when his father made possible for him a trip abroad. The young man went at once to Paris, where, though still earning his living by cutting cameos, he studied first at the Petite Ecole and later under Jouffroy in the Ecole des Beaux Arts. His master at that time led a revolt against the bloodless classicism of the period. Yet as the teacher never gave radical vent to his theories, so through later life the pupil tempered by a steadying restraint his desire for individual expression.

¶ In Paris Saint-Gaudens, a cheerful, athletic youth, made his two great friends who stood close to him all his life, M. Paul Bion and M. Alfred Garnier. Because of their friendship he nearly enlisted in the French army when the war with Prussia broke out. But a tearful letter from his mother changed his plans, so that instead he went to Rome, where, for about four years, he struggled with poverty and debts in his efforts to complete his training. At last, however, the cameo-cutting brought him a few lucky commissions from the family of Mr. Montgomery Gibbs, and gave Saint-Gaudens an opportunity to finish his first statue of "Hiawatha," to execute his first ordered monument, a figure of "Silence," and to go back to America with some prospect of definite work.

¶ The young man's career in the United States did not stretch out before him immediately in any such straight and easy manner as he may have expected. First one hope and then another fell through, though an occasional small task like that of the relief of Mr. D. Maitland Armstrong, came to his hands. But at last, after steady persistence, he obtained the order for the Farragut statue now in Madison Square, New York. From that day his position was assured, and soon he secured the opportunity to aid Mr. John LaFarge by modelling the sculpture for that painter's scheme of "Angels Adoring the Cross" in St. Thomas' Church on Fifth Avenue. So then, after founding the Society of American Artists with a number of other young men, and after his long-delayed marriage to Miss Augusta F. Homer, he went back to Paris to carry out his work.

¶ There in Paris he completed the Farragut and the Adoring Angels, though these larger commissions did not represent the only important step which he took at the time. He had long been interested in the subject of Renaissance reliefs and medals, such as those by Pisano, and Mr. LaFarge had already urged him to try his hand at like efforts. Accordingly, here, at last, he found an opportunity to begin upon a series of medallions which through life he developed with marked interest, among them those of Mr. William Gedney Bunce, Mr. Charles F. McKim, Mr. George W. Maynard, and especially that of M. Bastien Lepage.

¶ At last, with the completion of the Farragut, Saint-Gaudens definitely returned to New York to take up his well-established career as an American sculptor. For a time he lived in the Sherwood Studios at the corner of Fifty-seventh Street and Sixth Avenue. But soon he found a building at 148 West Thirty-sixth Street which he altered to his taste. There he continued to model for the next fifteen years, starting with the angels for the tomb of Ex-Governor Morgan, a monument which was burned in the cemetery while in process of carving.

¶ Here, too, in the Thirty-sixth Street studio, Saint-Gaudens gathered about him the friends of his life; such men as Mr. Stanford White, Mr. Charles F. McKim, Mr. Joseph Wells, and Mr. Thomas W. Dewing. Here Mr. H. H. Richardson, the Boston architect, brought Bishop Phillips Brooks whenever the two men visited New York, giving the sculptor the opportunity of meeting the preacher, a monument to whom was to be one of his last completed works. And here, as a boy to study art and to sweep the floors, came Frederick William MacMonnies.

¶ Saint-Gaudens had always been a lover of the theatre and of music. Now he found others who resembled him in their enthusiasm. Therefore, first this group, as well as Mr. Francis Lathrop, formed the habit of going to a little beer saloon on the East side of Broadway, opposite Washington Place, to listen to programmes furnished them by the peculiar combination of a violin, a clarinet and a piano. Then they employed the musicians to come on Sunday afternoons to the Thirty-sixth Street Studio. And, a little later, they developed more ambitious concerts which were held there weekly during the winters while the studio remained in Saint-Gaudens' hands.

¶ The intimacy with Mr. Richardson, which sprang up rapidly, led to Saint-Gaudens receiving the order for the monument to Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, which stands in front of the State House in Boston. On first consideration, the artist planned a modest relief, but, during the fourteen years devoted to it, the composition became a labor of love which consumed more of the sculptor's energy than he ever put into any other commission. The work upon the scaffolding before the Shaw during the hot summers with scarcely a pause to eat an apple for lunch undoubtedly hastened the breakdown of Saint-Gaudens' health. Yet, on the other hand, the monument furnished him with much amusement—an amusement which he invariably obtained from his art—both through the antics of the horse which posed for him, and through the very difficulties he encountered in hiring negro models, who persisted in believing the studio to be the den of a devil of vivisection.

¶ Along in this early period, too, came the Lincoln for Chicago, provided for in the will of Mr. Eli Bates, and the relief of Dr. James McCosh for Princeton,

New Jersey. In the case of the Lincoln the committee first asked Saint-Gaudens to compete. But upon his refusing, according to his principle, he received the order outright and eventually produced the gaunt, thoughtful figure now so well known.

¶ The statue to Deacon Samuel Chapin, popularly known as "The Puritan," followed the Lincoln. It has since acquired especial interest as in 1903 the New England Society of Pennsylvania commissioned the sculptor to make for Philadelphia a variation of the first work, and so therein Saint-Gaudens obtained one of his few opportunities of modifying his earlier efforts in accordance with his later ideas. The head he changed from the round Gaelic face of Chapin to a long New England profile, more typical of the austere forefather, while the folds of the cloak, the Bible and the base, he also altered to an extent.

¶ After the Chapin statue, Mr. Henry Adams ordered the figure for the Rock Creek Cemetery in Washington. In giving the commission Mr. Adams would only suggest that Saint-Gaudens consult with Mr. LaFarge, who thoroughly understood Mr. Adams' oriental thoughts. Therefore, the sculptor carried out his task as well as he could with the advice of the painter and ultimately, it seems, satisfied the wishes of Mr. Adams. Though there have been a variety of names accorded the result, Saint-Gaudens rarely expressed himself on the subject.

¶ During this time, while engaged upon the Rock Creek figure, Saint-Gaudens, at the suggestion of his friend, Mr. C. C. Beaman, first visited Cornish, New Hampshire. There, soon afterwards, he bought an old brick tavern which he altered into a summer home. And there, sixteen years later, he went to live permanently, much to the benefit of his last days.

¶ About that date also, in 1887, the sculptor met Robert Louis Stevenson through Mr. Will H. Low, an intimate mutual friend. The author and the sculptor at once admired one another, and the medallion, which has since assumed so many forms, Saint-Gaudens modelled in the Hotel Albert in Eleventh Street, Stevenson propped up in bed and his wife reading aloud. Only five sittings of two or three hours apiece could be obtained then, though later Saint-Gaudens had further opportunity when Stevenson lived at Manisquan, New Jersey.

¶ Shortly after this Saint-Gaudens set at modelling the figure for the "Smith" tomb in Newport, Rhode Island, from which he developed the better known "Amor Caritas." The first variation is now in the Luxembourg, Paris, while a second stands as a memorial to the daughter of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell in St. Stephen's Church, Philadelphia.

¶ In 1892, when the idea for the World's Fair had reached definite form, Saint-Gaudens, at the invitation of Mr. Daniel H. Burnham, went to Chicago with Mr. Richard M. Hunt, Mr. Charles F. McKim and others, as one of the Committee on the laying-out of the grounds. This was about the first of a long series of like tasks which the sculptor undertook through his life, hoping in such a way to aid the cause of art in his country. Mr. Burnham desired that Saint-Gaudens model a share of the sculpture. But the latter had so many calls upon him that he gave his personal attention only to the figure of Columbus in front of the Administration Building, which he carried out with the able assistance of Mrs. Francois M. L. Tonetti, then Miss Mary Lawrence, and to the Exposition Medal of which he designed the obverse. Upon the reverse of the Medal he originally modelled a nude boy, which raised a feminine hue and cry. At first he tried to satisfy this in a number of ways, but failing, he relinquished the attempt in disgust.

¶ The statue of Peter Cooper now took the place of the Rock Creek Cemetery figure upon the scaffolding behind the Shaw relief, which seemed almost a fixture. On the top floor of a large stable in Twentieth Street, the sculptor began one monument to General Logan for the Lake Front in Chicago, and another to President James A. Garfield for Fairmount Park, Philadelphia. While in a third and smaller studio, Saint-Gaudens modelled the horse of the Sherman from the famous high jumper Ontario, began the figure for the Sherman Victory from the woman whom he always considered to be the handsomest model he had ever seen, and finished with great interest his bas-relief of Mr. William Dean Howells and his daughter, Miss Mildred Howells.

¶ Before turning from his life in New York, mention should be made of Saint-Gaudens' teaching at the Art Student's League. His work there held a firm place in his thoughts. Again and again in later years he said regarding it that he always had felt surprised to see that for the most part women learned more readily than men, and that they copied what stood before them with greater facility, but that in the end the men made the further progress and composed and created to more purpose.

¶ During these last years, however, the sculptor's nervousness increased startlingly through overwork. Also he became anxious to compare what he had done with the sculpture recognized in Europe. So, as the unveiling of the Logan and the Shaw allowed him to shift his studio paraphernalia, he left for Paris in October, 1897. There he hired a studio in a quiet, garden-like alley at 3 bis Rue de Bagneux, where he remodelled the Sherman Cloak, the figure of the Victory and variations of the Stevenson for St. Giles Church in Edinburgh, and where he began his studies for the figures of the Boston Public Library.

¶ For some time Saint-Gaudens seemed unhappy and neurasthenic. But after a trip to his father's birthplace with his old friend M. Alfred Garnier, he returned in better spirits and took up his life in Paris and his intimacy with Dr. Henry Shiff and those others he had known so well in younger days. He said later that the three men who to him stood out before all the rest at that time were James MacNeill Whistler, Paul Dubois and Auguste Rodin. Saint-Gaudens regarded Paul Dubois' Joan of Arc as one of the greatest statues in the world. But Whistler in person most attracted the sculptor. For the painter came often to the studio in the evening and chatted with his usual wit, or accompanied Saint-Gaudens and his friends to their dinner at Foyot's, an old cafe opposite the Luxembourg. So, with such surroundings, with the gay life of the Parisian spring, with the benefit of a trip or two in Spain, and with the success accorded him by the French after his exhibitions in Paris, he regained his buoyancy, until suddenly he learned that he was ill and must go home.

¶ Saint-Gaudens' return to America in 1900 marked the last period of his life, a period which he spent for the most part in Cornish, New Hampshire. There he completed, besides lesser commissions, his monuments to Sherman, Lincoln, Brooks and the Caryatids for the Albright Art Gallery in Buffalo; and there he renewed his thoughts upon the groups to go before the Boston

Public Library. At this time, too, his attention turned more than ever before toward helping the cause of American Art. Two objects in especial interested him to a tremendous extent. One was the founding in Rome of the American Academy to be devoted to the Fine Arts much in the same manner as the Villa Medici School has been devoted by the French Government. The other was the artistic development of the National Capitol at Washington; where, in connection with The Park Commission, he spent much time and gave the best of his assistance in criticism and advice toward establishing on an even firmer basis the beauty of that city. Luckily, although ill, he continued his work for longer than expected because of his life in the open air. Skating, skeeing and golf he kept up while his health held out. And, at last, when he no longer could walk, he would sit by the hour upon one of the porches, or he would have himself carried from studio to studio in an improvised Sedan chair.

¶ His first serious occupation lay in the completion of the Sherman monument, which he modified from the model exhibited in Paris, studying the bronze after it had been set up in the field back of the house and changing it even then. On the Sherman also, he gratified his ambition to follow the example set by the statue of Marcus Aurelius on the Capitoline Hill in Rome and to gild an equestrian monument. For, as he expressed it, he was "sick of seeing statues look like stove pipes."

¶ Second in importance to him, he had by him in his studio the studies for the Boston Public Library Groups, constantly turning over the question of their development. One pedestal would have borne four figures symbolic of Executive Power, Law and Love. Upon the other base he planned three figures of Science, Labor and Music. For his own purpose, the studies were ready to be completed, and if he had lived he would have finished them in short order. They had long been upon his conscience. Yet to him the problem seemed so difficult, since the figures were to stand where they would force themselves upon the Library visitor, that he felt unwilling to carry them through until freed from financial considerations or the limitations of ill health.

¶ The "Crerar" Lincoln, also for Chicago, was the next vital commission which he set to work upon after the Sherman, and therein he carried out his old desire of representing the President seated. The first Lincoln had been a standing figure of Lincoln the Man, and now by way of contrast he wished to represent in addition a seated Lincoln the Head of the State. Therefore, to accomplish the purpose fittingly, he took up one of his series of endless experiments with four-foot models, composed in varying ways, and with full-sized painted paper representations of the entire composition erected out of doors. The monument is yet to be unveiled, but it went to the bronze founder some time before the sculptor's death.

¶ Another statue which Saint-Gaudens attacked with zest at virtually this same time, was of Charles Stewart Parnell, for Dublin, Ireland. The artist took interest here, because, as he often remarked, he had enough Irish in his make-up to appreciate the character of his subject. It is a peculiar coincidence that as few photographs of Parnell could be found, the sculptor turned to a series of caricatures published in Punch and like papers during Parnell's trial. So the very sketches drawn to attack the patriot ultimately came to be used in his honor.

¶ At this time, also, among his lesser commissions, Saint-Gaudens completed such busts as that of the Honorable John Hay and such reliefs as those of Mrs. C. C. Beaman, Justice Horace Gray, the Honorable Wayne MacVeagh and his Wife, and Justice and Mrs. Stanley Matthews. Probably the commission for the MacVeagh family absorbed him the most. The sculptor had often dwelt upon the strong magnetic power of the female sex as contrasted with the domination of the masculine intellect, and therefore here delighted in giving rein to his theories. Yet all portraits held his attention since he thoroughly enjoyed the peculiarities of his sitters, attempting habitually to shift his mental attitude to that of the person beside him, whether it was a hyper-sensitive woman or a rugged man.

¶ It seems especially unfortunate, in view of his ill health, that upon the night of October eleventh, 1904, his chief studio should have burned to the ground, not only with all the sculpture in progress, but as well with most of his portfolios containing the records of forty years. But he bravely set about recovering his lost ground, and before long had his commissions again well under way.

¶ Soon after this fire he returned to the Brooks monument which he had studied since 1901, and which he carried so far that only mechanical enlargement and casting was needed for its completion at the time of his death. As finished, the figure of the preacher stands to the front of an architectural canopy. His left hand grasps a Bible that rests upon a lectern, his right hand is raised in a gesture of emphasis, while the swing of the gown and the direct look from the head gives an atmosphere of energy and motion. Behind the Brooks, and against a cross that rises by His side, is a figure of Christ, half shadowed, veiled, reposeful, who touches the preacher on the shoulder with His right hand as if inspiring the words to be spoken. The complete monument Saint-Gaudens reached through his usual succession of alterations. In his first efforts he had an angel with the Brooks. Then he designed two figures of the Christ in relief. And only after much thought did he decide to make this ideal figure in the round.

¶ Saint-Gaudens' work now drew to its close, and his final tasks included solely the designs for three of the United States coins, The Caryatids for the Albright Art Gallery, and the bas-relief of his wife.

¶ The coins he undertook at the suggestion of President Roosevelt. But the confusion of the carrying out of this commission often made him regret that he had entered upon it. Finally, however, after a discussion which lasted over a year and a half, it was settled that the Cent should exhibit a profile head on one side and lettering alone on the other; that the Ten-Dollar gold piece should carry the same head with shifted inscriptions and a standing eagle; and that the Twenty-Dollar gold piece should show a full length figure of Liberty and a flying eagle. The flying eagle Saint-Gaudens developed from the bird on the 1857 white Cent. The standing eagle, he re-altered from a design he had used on such works as the Shaw Memorial, the Roosevelt Inauguration Medal and the shield of the Garfield Monument. Seventy or more models of the bird were to be seen in the studio waiting for the casual visitor to name his preference. The profile head Saint-Gaudens modelled in relief from an unused bust for the Sherman Victory, while the full length Liberty he rendered from a scheme he had long had in mind. It is most unfortunate that the Mint did not notify the sculptor when they abandoned the thought of a new design for the Cent, as thereon he wasted precious hours; while the placing of the motto "In God We Trust" on the gold coins by other hands than his, will still further mar a composition which has already suffered greatly in the process of reproduction.

¶ The Caryatids, his final large commission, absorbed him to a tremendous degree and marked his ultimate tendency to draw away from the decorative in favor of the monumental. As the building they were to adorn is large and reposeful, the sculptor wished to reflect these qualities. First he considered having winged figures. Then he believed it might be well to place garlands in their hands. Next he originated the scheme wherein the four central Caryatids held lettered tablets, those on the ends carrying palms. Finally he decided to place palms in the hands of the ones on the corners, while the middle figures should bear objects which denoted Architecture, Painting, Sculpture and Music.

¶ The relief which he made of Mrs. Saint-Gaudens was the last work which he touched with his hands. The composition diverted him greatly as he could work on it while seated. But his death came before he could finish it.

¶ During the last few years Saint-Gaudens was ill for much of the time, yet whenever pain left him for a few hours, his courage and his hope returned and he constantly repeated to his friends that life became more and more worth living as each day passed.

MODELLED BY AVG. SAINT-GAVDENS
PARIS MDCCCLXXIX-MDCCCLXXX.

Lent by the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Cast made by permission of Commissioner of Parks, Borough of Manhattan.

Note. The original monument stands at the northeast corner of Madison Square Garden, New York City. The stone pedestal forms a semicircular seat, divided by the pier upon which the figure stands, and terminating at either end in carved dolphins. Upon the central pier is a symbolic sword, plunged down through the waves which flow across it and over two seated female figures carved in low relief at either side. The seat is raised three steps from the level of the park, and the space about its foot is paved with pebbles in which a bronze crab is sunk. The inscription which completes the decoration of the stone seat-back reads in part as follows:

DAVID GLASGOW FARRAGVT. THAT THE MEMORY OF A DARING AND SAGACIOVS COMMANDER AND GENTLE GREAT-SOVLED MAN WHOSE LIFE FROM CHILDHOOD WAS GIVEN TO HIS COVNTRY BVT WHO SERVED HER SVPREMELY IN THE WAR FOR THE VNION MDCCCLXI-MDCCCLXV MAY BE PRESERVED AND HONORED ... HIS COVNTRYMEN HAVE SET VP THIS MONVMENT A. D. MDCCCLXXXI. BORN ... MDCCCI. (Follows a biographical sketch.) DIED ... MDCCCLXX.

This was the first statue commissioned from Saint-Gaudens for a public place. It was modelled in Paris, exhibited there in the Salon of 1880, and unveiled in New York in 1881, marking an epoch in American sculpture and decorative art.

THE HEAD OF THE FIGURE ON THE ADAMS MONUMENT

This head was in the studio of Mr. Augustus Saint-Gaudens when everything was destroyed in 1904 with the exception of this head and the portrait of his son, Mr. Homer Saint-Gaudens. "The Adams Monument head was especially notable that dreary morning after the fire when there was absolutely nothing else left standing or saved."

Lent by Mrs. Augustus Saint-Gaudens.

ADAMS MONUMENT, ROCK CREEK CEMETERY, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Plaster cast from bronze statue, unsigned and undated. [About 1891]. A figure, enveloped in heavy drapery, which covers the head and body with the exception of the face and right arm, the hand of which supports the chin. Directed to the front, eyes lowered.

Lent by the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Cast made by permission of Mr. Henry Adams.

Note. The monument consists of a block of granite against which the figure leans, and which forms one side of an hexagonal plot of about twenty feet in diameter. Opposite and occupying three sides of the hexagon is a massive stone bench. The figure has been variously interpreted, although Saint-Gaudens gave no name to it.

ADAMS MONUMENT.

SIX CIRCULAR RELIEFS, IN PLASTER

Head of a woman, in profile, with parted lips; directed left; wearing olive wreath. Above, thirteen stars. In exergue: LIBERTY. D. $11\frac{7}{8}$ in.

Note. Unused design, originally intended for one-cent piece.

Similar to the preceding, with Indian head-dress substituted for olive wreath, and with margin of relief lowered. D. $11\frac{3}{4}$ in.

Note. Design for obverse of ten-dollar gold piece.

American eagle, standing; arrows and olive branch in claws. In upper right field, inscription: .E. PLURIBUS . UNUM.

Legend: .UNITED.STATES.OF.AMERICA. Exergue: .TWENTY.DOLLARS. D. 12½ in.

Note. Design intended for reverse of the twenty-dollar gold piece, but used for the ten.

Full-length figure of winged woman, standing, directed front; flowing hair, Indian head-dress, classic robe; torch in right hand, olive branch in left; left foot raised on a rock against which is an oak branch. In the lower left field a small sketch of the Capitol building, with rising sun; lower right field, MCMVII. Border of forty-six stars. Signature at lower left, monogram A ST G. Edge beveled. D. 12½ in.

Note. Original idea for obverse of twenty-dollar gold piece.

Similar to the preceding, but without wings or head-dress for the figure; Capitol building enlarged, rays of sun lengthened and extended across from left to right. Border of stars nearer center, leaving wider margin. Signature: in lower right field, monogram A ST G. Edge: thirteen stars with legend E . PLURIBUS . UNUM . D. 12⅛ in.

Note. Design for obverse of twenty-dollar gold piece.

American eagle, flying, directed left. Below, rising sun, with rays extending to margin. Legend: . UNITED . STATES . OF . AMERICA . TWENTY . DOLLARS . D. 13½ in.

Note. Design intended for one-cent piece, but used for twenty-dollar piece.

PORTRAITS OF SAINT GAUDENS

PORTRAIT OF AUGUSTUS SAINT-GAUDENS BY KENYON COX, 1908

KENYON COX 1908.

Lent by the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Note. The original picture was painted, on a smaller scale, in the sculptor's Thirty-sixth Street Studio in 1887. It was destroyed in the fire in his studio in Cornish, N. H., in 1904. This replica was painted in 1908. The sculptor is represented at work upon the relief portrait of William M. Chase. Behind his head, to the left, is a solar print of one of the Vanderbilt caryatids. A cast of the "Unknown Lady" of the Louvre stands beyond. Next is the bronze relief of Homer Saint-Gaudens as an infant, and beyond that the plaster relief of Miss Lee. The scaffolding behind the easel is the back of the Shaw Memorial. [Signed] KENYON COX.

122

PORTRAIT OF AUGUSTUS SAINT-GAUDENS BY HENRY HERING

Plaster bust, facing and looking full front. H. 17 in. (plinth, H. 7 in.).

Lent by Mr. Henry Hering.

HAND OF AUGUSTUS SAINT-GAUDENS

Bronze cast from plaster cast in the possession of Mr. George W. Maynard. The original cast was made to assist Mr. Maynard in representing a hand holding a flag for one of the figures in his painting entitled "1776," now owned by Smith College.

Lent by Mr. Daniel C. French.

124

A PHOTOGRAPH OF AUGUSTUS SAINT-GAUDENS AT ABOUT SEVENTEEN YEARS OF AGE

Lent by Miss Lucille A. Le Brethon.

Note. The following is a transcription of an explanatory letter addressed to the Secretary of the Saint-Gaudens Memorial Exhibition by Miss Lucille A. Le Brethon:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 17th, and delayed answering as I wished to procure from my niece, Mrs. Arnold Moser, 214 East 15th Street, a topaz cameo, the very first piece of work made by Augustus Saint-Gaudens under my father's tuition. The onyx cameo which I am also sending you for exhibition is one of the last things made by him while with my father, Jules Le Brethon. There can be no doubt of the authenticity of these two cameos (which my father always kept and prized very much), as the accompanying photograph shows him at work in my father's studio. I am sending the two cameos and photograph under separate cover by registered mail.
